Looking after your Mental Health during Pregnancy and Beyond

Advice and support information for expectant and new mothers, anyone planning a pregnancy or partners, grandparents, family and friends that may be supporting someone who is expecting or has a baby

Finding out that you're pregnant

Your personal journey to becoming pregnant is individual and varied. Your pregnancy may have been planned or unplanned. It may have happened quickly and easily or you may have encountered difficulties along the way.

Your feelings about learning that you're pregnant depend on this journey. You may feel happy, excited and full of joy. Or you may feel anxious, worried and concerned. You may still be feeling unsure and struggling to adjust to the news.

Whatever the journey, you have now reached an incredible milestone. You are preparing to become a Mum. This is happening in very unusual and extraordinary times due to the current Coronavirus pandemic. This may contribute to new and unexpected challenges.

Transitions in pregnancy

Pregnancy is a time of great change. Many Mums find that being pregnant re-awakens memories from their own childhood. This may bring up questions for you.

Pregnancy can also bring about changes in your relationship with your partner. If you are feeling threatened or unsafe, please speak with one of your maternity care providers.

Pregnancy also brings about a change in identity and in your sense of yourself in the world.

Take some time to reflect on the kind of Mum you would like to be for your baby? What is most important to you? What are your hopes and wishes for this child?

This is also a lovely time to start connecting with your baby growing inside you.

Try to imagine them and picture them in your mind as they grow.

Sometimes it's helpful to gently close your eyes and rest your hands on your belly. As your baby gets bigger, your touch may even elicit a little 'hello' kick in return.

The birth of your baby – becoming a Mum

You have now reached the culmination of your pregnancy journey. Your baby's birth may have been as you wished or it may have brought challenges and complications.

Right now you may be feeling joy, hope and a sense of relief. You may also be feeling sad, worried, down and exhausted. However you're feeling is OK.

Having a baby is a time of huge change. It is normal to feel many different emotions. You will likely be experiencing these feelings through a fog of exhaustion as well which can make them feel even more intense.

Many mothers feel a sudden sense of responsibility for caring for their baby. This can trigger worry, doubt and feelings of guilt for not living up to the idea of the 'ideal mother'.

You will get most things right but you will also get little things wrong. Allow that be OK.

There is no way to be the perfect mother and a million ways to be a good one

Getting to know your baby

Your baby is a unique individual with their own traits and personality characteristics. Give yourself the time to get to know their rhythms and patterns.

Let go of what you cannot control. Some babies have an easy temperament. Others are more difficult to soothe. Some will quickly settle into a consistent sleep pattern. Others will be more wakeful.

However, your baby will thrive when they feel safe and secure and loved. To provide this for your baby, you need to protect time for caring for yourself.

Take up any offers of help and support. Reach out to family, friends and other new Mums for emotional and social support. Don't try to do it all alone!

Your Mental Health in Pregnancy and after birth

Up to 80% of new Mums will experience the 'baby blues' in the days after birth – feeling irritable, low, anxious and crying easily.

This usually ends when your baby is about 10 days old. However if these feelings continue for longer than 2 weeks, it's important to talk with your G.P., Midwife or Public Health Nurse to see if you need some additional support.

Up to 1 in 5 women will experience a mental health problem in pregnancy or in the first year after birth. If you have suffered from a mental health problem in the past, you may be more vulnerable to relapse at this time.

This is nothing to feel ashamed of. With the right help and support, you will get back on track and begin to grow in confidence as a Mum and enjoy being with your baby.
